1. Introduction

1.1 Research Topic

We live in a digital democracy - a hyper-connected society, where most human interactions are held online and through social media. Social media platforms influence social dynamics through which opinions form and shift (Anstead, N. & Oloughlin, B., 2014). Today, these online communications not only shape people's opinions on democracy, but also influence their decision-making as voters (Franch, 2013; Jensen & Anstead, 2013). Hence the problem tackled in this research is to understand whether political presence on Twitter (i.e. politicians' 'tweets') influenced public opinion on the Brexit Referendum. Subsequently, to test our hypothesis we use Twitter data to analyse the impact of sentiments and views expressed in UK politicians' tweets on Brexit Opinion Polls.

1.2 Relevance for the Subject Matter

With an increasing number of user accounts actively engaging on social media, a large number of discussions are now virtual. The network effect of Twitter enables one to reach a wide network of users. Hence, political leaders around the world are now using Twitter to campaign and communicate with their followers (Kruikeimer, S., 2014; Lamarre, H.L. & Suzuki-Lambrecht, Y., 2013). In this study, we hypothesise that UK politicians' views expressed online influenced people's opinion (and ultimately their vote) on the Brexit referendum (alternative hypothesis H1). As social science students, we are interested in studying this problem as it allows us to analyse the effects of social media on public opinion. Furthermore, the findings from this research could be applied to different political contexts across the globe, such as; analysing the impact of social media campaigning on National Elections in other democracies. Furthermore, this approach can be extended to study the impact of various other stakeholders such as - business leaders, investors, influencers and celebrities on shaping public opinion. However, we do recognise its limitations in terms of external validity, due to its small sample size and the sentiment analysis approach.

1.3 Using Data Analytics

Since this relationship between social media and public opinion is ambiguous and unclear, the use of machine learning techniques will enable us to identify trends and correlations between politicians' tweets and changes in Brexit opinion polls. In what follows, we use a collection of publicly available Public Opinion Polls and Twitter Data to demonstrate how politicians' tweets both 'for' and 'against'

Brexit influenced public voting intentions. We use data analytics to create a variable change_brexit to understand change in polling outcomes over time. We also identify the tweets in the Twitter dataset with a brexit variable (=1 if the tweet is by a ‘pro-Leave’ politician or =0 if the tweet is by a ‘pro-Remain’ politician). Using sentiment analysis,, we then mine these tweets to understand its emotional intent. We use these classifications to show how certain sentiments used in political tweets correlate with independently conducted public opinion polls i.e. cause changes in public opinion.

1.4 Goals of the Study

The goal of the study is to mine the Twitter Dataset to identify whether different sentiment scores and views expressed in politicians’ tweets influence the public’s views on the EU Referendum measured via opinion polls.

For the purpose of the study, we have made several assumptions:

- Hypothesis:

Null Hypothesis	Alternative Hypothesis
$H_0: \beta_1 = \beta_2 = \dots = \beta_{10} = 0$ i.e. Different types of tweets (captured by sentiments, brexit) do not affect changes in opinion polls in different ways → there is no relationship between sentiments and changes in public opinion.	$H_1: \beta_1 \neq \beta_2 \neq \dots \neq \beta_{10} \neq 0$ i.e. Different types of tweets (captured by sentiments, brexit) affect changes in opinion polls in different ways → there is a relationship between sentiments, stance on brexit (remain or leave) and changes in public opinion.

- We have simplified the change in polls into two movements: CHANGE and NO CHANGE, as predicting the exact changes are too difficult. (Here the direction of change is ignored).
- Furthermore, the timeline i.e. the dates on which polls are conducted do not align with the dates on which politicians tweet. This is because polls are conducted more infrequently, and spread over a period of time, while politicians tweet daily and even several times a day. Hence, after analysing the sentiment score for each tweet, we have calculated a mean of the scores for each sentiment and for brexit leading upto a given poll. This gives us one value for each independent value ‘x’(sentiment or brexit) for each value of the binary dependent variable (change in a given public opinion poll, change_brexit). Thus, in this study, the mean sentiment scores of politicians’ tweets are considered influential if it will likely result in a significant change in the corresponding public opinion poll, for each period. The analytical approach to do so will be explained and explored further.

1.5 The Status Quo- Contributing to Existing Studies

Through this report, we aim to build on previous research on the influence of social media on electoral campaigns and contribute to existing studies about the forecasting errors surrounding the Brexit Referendum (Glencross, A., 2016; Beauchamp, 2017, Caldarelli, Chessa, Pammolli, Pompa, Puliga, Riccaboni, and Riotta, 2014). Our approach differentiates itself from previous attempts by specifically analysing the Twitter Data of politicians' tweets on corresponding opinion polls rather than using data from online public forums and discussions. Also, most studies focused on the impact of Twitter data and social media discussions on the actual voting outcome. Contrastingly, we look at impact of politician's tweets on opinion polls rather than actual voting since, interestingly, the voting outcome for the EU Referendum was wrongly predicted by opinion polls. However, this approach comes with several limitations such as Twitter users not being demographically representative of the entire UK voting population (Barberá, 2015) and concerns regarding data veracity of the Opinion Polls and the Twitter Database. The report concludes with an analysis of the impact and ways to mitigate these limitations.

2. Data

The analysis was based primarily on two sources of data- 2.1) Independently conducted Public Opinion Polls and 2.2) Twitter Dataset on UK politicians' tweets for and against Brexit. These datasets were collected for the dates 22nd of September 2015 to the 22nd of June 2016 for two primary reasons:

- 22nd of September 2015 - On this day, the then Foreign Secretary Hammond announced that the UK EU Referendum is likely to be held in 2016. This statement resulted in an increase in social media discussions and campaigns for and against Brexit (Reuters, 2015). Hence, this was a significant date to start the data collection.
- 22nd of June 2016 - This was the last date on which Public Opinion Polls were conducted- the next day i.e. 23rd June 2016, was the day of the Referendum vote.

Therefore, for the purpose of this report, the data was collected for the aforementioned time period.

2.1 Data from Public Opinion Polls

The polling data was collected from two primary sources -

- HuffPost Pollster - A poll aggregator that collected polling data from 25 different sources and
- NatCen - A social research organisation that compiled 168 different sources of polling data.

Table 1 outlines the Pollsters considered i.e. the sources from which the data was collected.

The polls were mainly carried out Online and via Telephone interview. For a poll to be included in the dataset, it had to meet various criteria to ensure transparency and veracity in data collection and processing such as - the date of survey, sampling method, population sampled, size of sample, margin of error etc¹. The next step was to 'clean this dataset'.

The first step in the preparation of the polling data was creating the brexit_wins variable, such that

$$\text{brexit_wins} = \begin{cases} = 1 & \text{if Leave} \geq \text{Remain} \\ = 0 & \text{if Leave} < \text{Remain} \end{cases}$$

The next step involved creating the change_brexit variable, such that; i.e. change_brexit variable = CHANGE if leave was winning a given poll and remain wins the subsequent poll or if remain was winning a given poll and leave wins the subsequent poll.

$$\text{change_brexit} = \begin{cases} = \text{CHANGE} & \text{if poll outcome changes} \\ = \text{NO CHANGE} & \text{otherwise} \end{cases}$$

change_brexit variable = NO CHANGE if the outcome of the poll stays consistent for two consecutive polls.

Hence, the change_brexit variable captures a change in public opinion resulting in a change in which side (Leave vs Remain) was winning each consecutive poll. However, one of the limitations of our study is that we are not able to infer on which side people are more inclined to go, i.e. Leave or Remain.

2.2 Twitter Dataset

As the number of active users i.e the installed base grows, social media platforms like Twitter increasingly benefit from the network effect. An increase in the number of users of the platform makes it more valuable to adopt it (Jackson, D., Thorsen, E. & Wring, D., 2016). Hence, world-leaders and heads of states are becoming increasingly active on platforms like Twitter to communicate with their electoral base, who in turn ‘follow’ these leaders to receive their messages or ‘tweets’ (Kruikemeier, S., 2014; Lamarre, H.L. & Suzuki-Lambrecht, Y., 2013). In order to understand how these politicians used Twitter to influence public opinion on Brexit, we captured the data from the short messages they broadcast to their followers in the form of ‘tweets’.

We first identified a list of most ‘popular’ UK politicians on Twitter. This was done by identifying and ranking politicians according to highest number of followers². This list was divided into two - politicians in favour of Brexit (Leave) and those who were against the UK leaving the EU (Remain). We then collected and downloaded tweets of each politician identified on the list using a Twitter API service - Vicinitas. The Twitter API service provides a free download of a limited number of tweets for a given user. This gave us a Twitter Database of 3200 of the most recent tweets from each politician. However, given our specific time frame (22nd September 2015 to 22nd June 2016), we had to further filter our data to obtain tweets within this period. To bypass this limitation and have a balanced dataset, we decided to collect an equal number of politicians’ tweets both for and against Brexit, rather than collecting tweets for an equal number of politicians on each side. Table 2 indicates the politicians included in the dataset.

² Criteria used for ranking politicians can be found here: <https://www.mpsonTwitter.co.uk/list/followers>

Total Number of Tweets: 3422	Total Number of Tweets: 3437

This gave us a total of 6859 tweets by politicians campaigning for both Leave and Remain. The next step was to ‘clean’ i.e. pre-process the dataset - this allowed us to statistically analyse the tweets. First, the text within each tweet was converted into lowercase. Then all blank space, punctuations, links, tabs and stop words were removed. The tm: Text Mining Package was used to remove English stop-words. The next step in data preparation was creating the brexit variable, such that:

$$\text{brexit} = \begin{cases} = 1 & \text{if the tweet belongs to a for-Brexit (Leave) politician} \\ = 0 & \text{if the tweet belongs to an against-Brexit (Remain) politician} \end{cases}$$

Hence, this variable allowed us to identify which tweets were posted by Leave politicians and which ones were posted by Remain politicians and integrate this during the regression analysis stage.

3. Data Analysis

After cleaning the datasets the next step is data analysis- we do this primarily by conducting Sentiment Analysis and running Multiple Logistic Regressions.

3.1 Timeline and Mean

Before we could run a regression to analyse the effect of sentiment score on change in Brexit poll outcomes, we had to first align the politicians’ tweets according to the timeline of the polling data i.e. the dates on which polls are conducted did not align with the dates on which politicians’ tweeted. This is because polls are conducted more infrequently, and spread over a period of time, while politicians tweet daily and even several times a day. Hence, after analysing the sentiment score for each tweet, we have calculated a mean sentiment score and mean value for the brexit variable leading upto a given poll. This gives us one value for each independent value 'x' (sentiment or brexit) for each value of the binary dependent variable (change in a given public opinion poll expressed via variable change_brexit).

3.2 Word Cloud

Social media data tends to be noisy (Amador, J. et al., 2017). Hence, as a starting point of our analysis, in order to better understand the underlying patterns of our datasets, we first created several Word Clouds depicting the most frequent words tweeted. The following images outline our findings:

Image 1: Word Cloud with the Most Frequent Words for the Whole Twitter Dataset

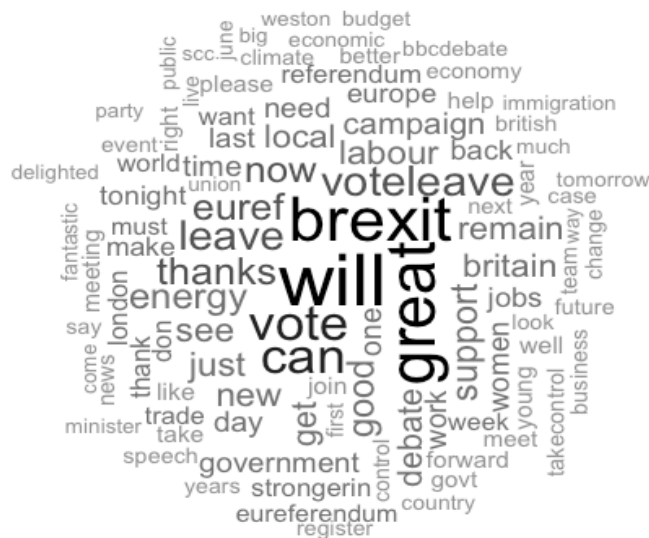

Image 2: Word Cloud with the Most Frequent Words for the Remain Twitter Dataset

Image 3: Word Cloud with the Most Frequent Words for the Leave Twitter Dataset

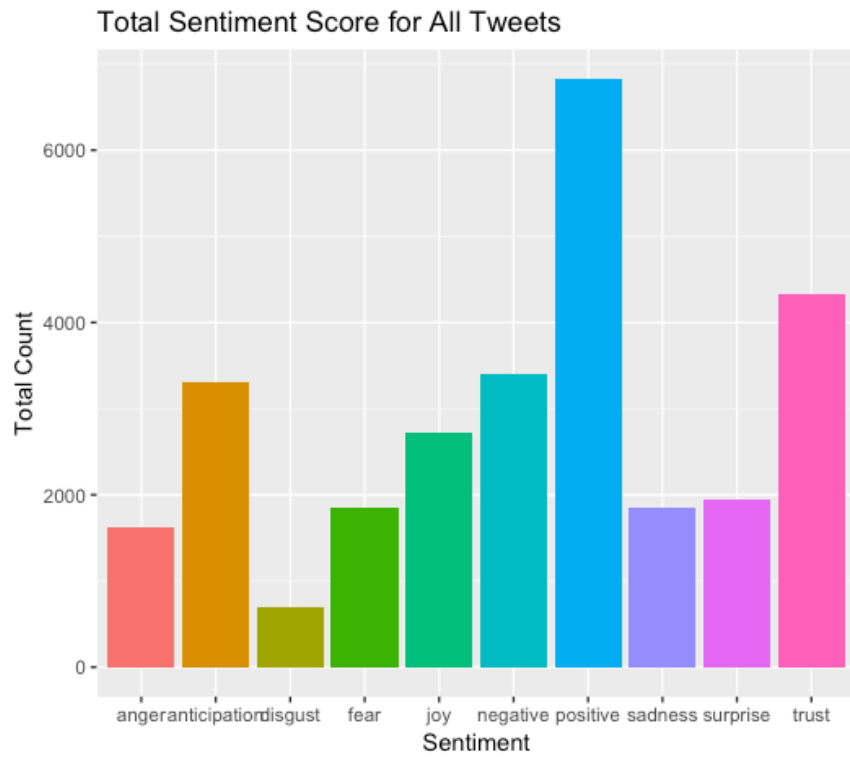

The next step was to carry out a sentiment analysis for each of the Twitter Datasets. This will allow us to extrapolate some trends and relations in our data from the study of sentiments and the most frequently used words for each user group (Remain vs. Leave).

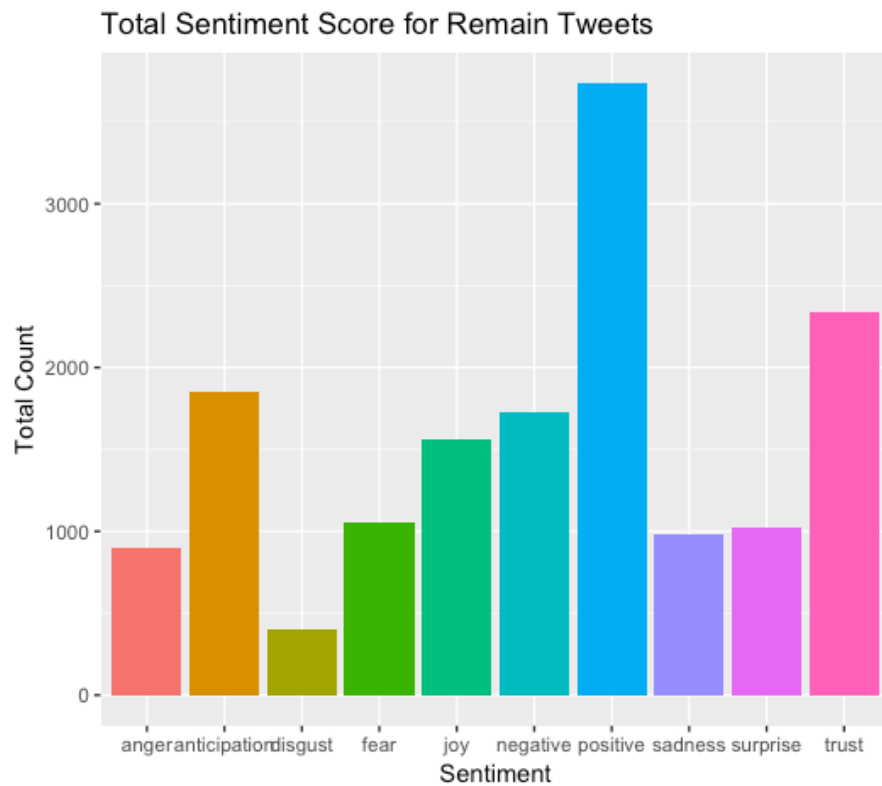

3.3 Sentiment Analysis

We used the "syuzhet package" to conduct a Sentiment Analysis to approach the emotional content of the text programmatically and mine the tweets to understand its emotional intent. The package considers the tweet as an entire sentence, rather than as tokenised words. Instead of base the lexicons on unigrams and risking adding up the positive and negative sentiment scores that cancel each other out, we decided to tokenise the sentences. Therefore, we were able to take into account multiple sentiments within a given tweet, since the 10 sentiments are not mutually exclusive (e.g. a tweet can have sadness, positive and anger scores). We then generated sentiment analysis for each tweet, classifying each observation with multiple categories of sentiments namely- positive, negative, anger, anticipation, disgust, fear, joy, sadness, surprise, and trust. The plots below depict the sentiment score distribution.

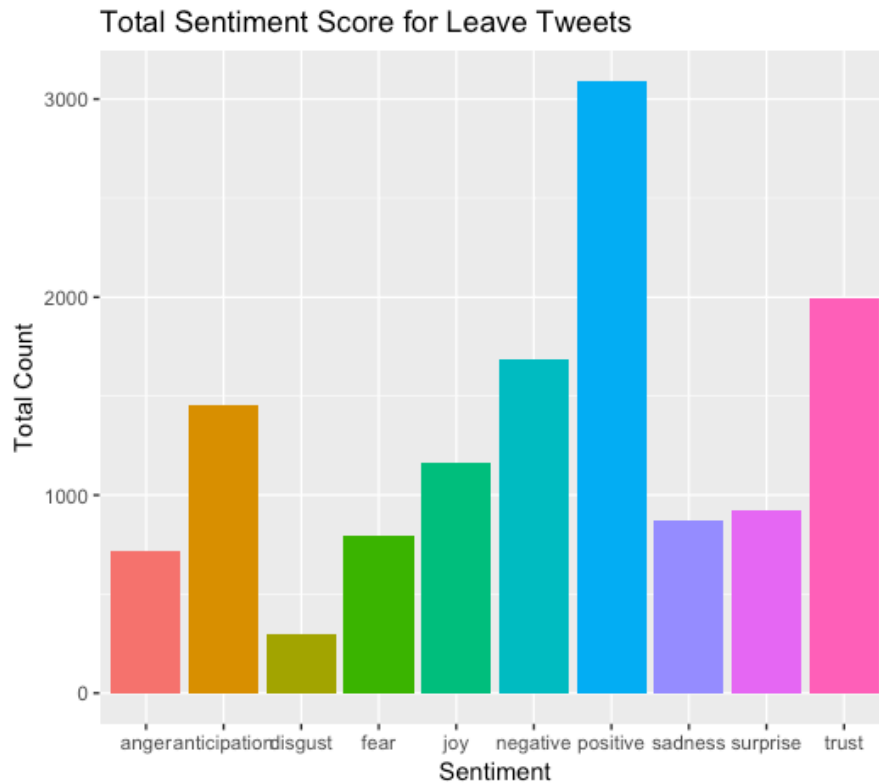

Plot 1: Total Sentiment Score Distribution for All Tweets by All Politicians

Plot 2: Total Sentiment Score Distribution for Tweets by Remain Politicians

Plot 3: Total Sentiment Score Distribution for Tweets by Leave Politicians

Later in our study, we will run a regression of mean sentiment scores on change_brexit to study how tweets with certain sentiments cause changes in public opinion. Furthermore, comparing each Word Cloud to its respective Sentiment Score Distribution, allows us to extrapolate some trends to guide our data analysis by looking at the language used and the sentiments associated with it in each of the ‘Remain’ and ‘Leave’ tweets. The following can be deduced:

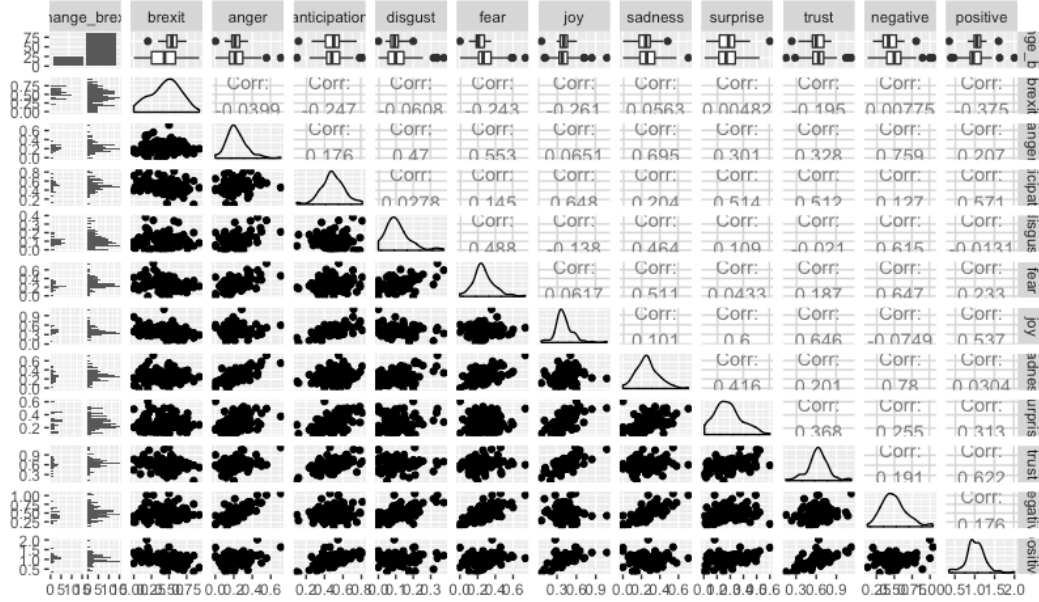

- Remain politicians frequently tweet words like “great”, “energy”, “strongerin”, “labour”, “local” and “new”, which unsurprisingly, positively influenced its positive and trust scores (that are higher than Leave’s positive and trust scores). Therefore, we would expect variables such as brexit, positive and trust to interact with each other.
- Leave politicians frequently used words such as “great”, “takecontrol”, “trade”, “immigration”, “back” and “support”, which are rather neutral words. Compared to the sentiment scores for the remain tweets, the leave tweets show lower sentiment scores overall. Hence, it can be concluded that leave tweets, on average were less sentimental. We can therefore extrapolate that the variable brexit will probably be statistically significant in affecting change_brexit.

- Both Remain and Leave politicians have similar negative scores, which could mean that these variables do not interact with the variable brexit.

3.4 Matrix Plot

As part of pre-processing stage of evaluation, before fitting the model, we created a plot matrix using the whole dataset, before dividing into training and testing sets. This allowed us to analyse the correlations between all the variables in our set, given the class labels (see Plot 4).

Plot 4: Plot Matrix for regression_dataset

Results from this plot matrix confirm some obvious relationships. Firstly, we can conclude that “negative” and “brexit” variables are uncorrelated, which supports are previous deduction (in Section 3.2). Also, because brexit does not seem to have any particular correlation with the other variables, running a regression with interaction terms between brexit and other variables will not yield any statistically significant results. Hence, our assumption (in Section 3.2) to include a *brexit*positive* interaction term is not supported. Furthermore, from the boxplots, it can be concluded that the correlations between the explanatory variables and change_brexit are either nonexistent or very small, meaning that the statistical significance of their correlation scores will be rather small, once we run the regression. However, the explanatory variables seem to be correlated with each other. This comes as no surprise since sentiments are not mutually exclusive and are highly related. For example, sadness and anger are positively correlated as one would expect. Similarly, surprise and joy are positively correlated with one another. These interactions between predictors should affect the accuracy of our model. But, because as mentioned before, these do not show great correlation with the dependent variable, it should not represent a problem because these will likely not be included in our final model.

3.5 Multiple Logistic Regression

As stated above, the dependent variable change_brexit is a binary (categorical) variable while the explanatory variables are numeric continuous variables. Hence, we used multiple logistic regressions to analyse our hypothesis. We fitted a model to analyse how the tweets' sentiment score (anger, anticipation, disgust, fear, joy, sadness, surprise, trust, negative, positive) and politicians' opinion on brexit (= 1 if leave and = 0 if remain) influenced the public opinion (change_brexit = 1 if change and = 0 if no change) regarding the Brexit Referendum (see Table 1, page 14).

In Model 1 (see Equation 2, page 15) all explanatory variables were included. However, interestingly, most explanatory variables are not statistically significant. For example, the model indicates that using the sentiments angry, sad or trust in tweets by politicians do not impact changes in opinion polls regarding Brexit.

After removing all the insignificant explanatory variables in Model 2 to avoid any overfitting (see Equation 3, page 15) - which confirmed part of our extrapolations - the results show that tweets with high negative scores have a significant impact on change in public opinion ($\beta = 3.851, p < 0.01$). In other words, negative tweets will likely generate a shift in citizens' opinion regarding Brexit. Furthermore, the variable brexit in our model captures the proportion of Leave politicians tweeting for period i. Hence, we can see that when Leave politicians are more active on Twitter (i.e. as the number of tweets 'pro-Leave' increases), public opinion on Brexit is less likely to change. In fact, there is a significant correlation between brexit and change_brexit ($\beta = -3.565, p < 0.01$). Finally, the use of positive sentiments in tweets made by politicians does not have a statistically significant impact on shifts in public opinion ($\beta = -1.952$). It is also important to note that we decided not to include interaction variables *positive*brexit* and *negative*brexit* due to the conclusions from our extrapolations from before (Section 3.4).

On the one hand, there is statistically significant evidence that when more Leave politicians tweeted public opinion was less likely to shift. On the other hand, if politicians tweet with a negative sentiment, a shift in public opinion regarding the EU Referendum was likely to be observed. Our alternative hypothesis is therefore supported, for the explanatory variables negative and brexit.

It is important to acknowledge that the estimates from our logistic regression characterize the relationship between the predictor and response variable on a log-odds scale. For example, this model suggests that for every one unit increase in negative, the log-odds of the public opinion changing increases by 3.851. Because this way of analysing our model is not very practical, we used the exponential function to calculate the odds ratios for each predictor (See Table 2). This informs us that for every one unit increase in negative, the odds of the public opinion changing increases by a factor of 47.03.

Equation 2: Model 1 (all explanatory variables)

Equation 3: Model 2 (brexit and negative, only explanatory variables)

To evaluate the accuracy of our models, we used the holdout evaluation approach. We initially divided the data into two sets: training set and testing (holdout) set. The models were fit using the training set and then validated on the holdout dataset. This means that our models were not trained with the test data. Therefore, the holdout evaluation provides a measure for how well our explanatory variables generalise to the overall corpus of tweets.

We used the caret Package in R that associates an Accuracy Score to each model, based on the overall agreement rate averaged over iterations (Kuhn, 2018). The combination with the optimal resampling statistic is chosen as the final model and the entire training set is used to fit a final model (Kuhn, 2018). This evaluation approach for the training data, gives a 68.9% accuracy for Model 1 and a 76.1% for Model 2. For the testing data, we obtain a 56.3% accuracy score for Model 1 and 60.5% for Model 2 (see Table 4 page 16). For both the training and testing data, Model 2 performs better than Model 1, by avoiding overfitting and only including the explanatory variables that have significant impact over changes in opinion polls. For the testing data, even though Model 2 improves the fitting of the model, it does not perform as well as for the training data. This could be due to the chosen split ratio ($p = 0.8$) and the small sample size ($n = 110$) of our analysis.

4. Conclusion

The role of information is critical in motivating political participation (Huckfeldt and Sprague, 1995), resulting in voters seeking information about political events and politicians’ seeking information about their constituents (Hersh, 2015). As a result, social media has come to play a pivotal role in swaying public opinion (Sajuria and Fabrega, 2016) This is particularly true in the case of the Brexit Referendum, wherein there were significant forecasting errors in polling data (Berinsky, 2017). Hence, our study seeks to provide insight into the ways in which politicians used social media (specifically Twitter) to influence people’s views on Brexit.

4.1 Findings

Our study linked the sentiment analysis of politician’s tweets to polling data. This enabled us to study the relationship between the politicians’ Twitter communication and its effect on public opinion polls. The main takeaway is that the more active Leave politicians are on Twitter, the less likely their tweets are to shift public opinion. Also, the more negative tweets are posted, the more likely that is to change public opinion on Brexit on the next poll. The effectiveness of our approach stems from the fact that nearly 20% of the UK population are active users of Twitter (Amador, J. et al., 2017). Hence, given that majority of opinion polls were conducted online, it is likely that a significant percentage of the respondents were also active Twitter users. Hence, impact of politicians’ tweets on public opinion may have been captured in the polls to a large extent. Furthermore, by having an equal amount of tweets i.e. 3422 politicians’ tweets for Leave and 3437 politician’ tweets for Remain, we were able to obtain unbiased estimates.

4.2 Limitations

There are several factors that limit the scope of this research:

- Omitted Variable Bias – Contrary to our earlier observation that the correlation between the explanatory variables and the dependent variable are very small or non-existent (in Section 3.4), we then found contradicting results when fitting our logistic model. This made us believe that the negative and brexit variables are probably capturing the effect of other variables that we are not including in our model (omitted variable problem). This aligns with the fact that not everyone is an active user of Twitter, respondents of the opinion polls may differ from Twitter users and thus may be unaware of politicians' tweets. Also, there are other exogenous events that we are not evaluating such as news, negotiation outcomes and other social, economic and institutional variables. Therefore, it is proven difficult to accurately measure the impact of politicians' tweet on swaying public opinion of the Brexit Referendum.

- Time Sensitivity - Frequency of opinion polls and politician's tweets may be out of sync i.e. while politicians tweet daily, often several times a day, opinion polls are conducted relatively infrequently. Therefore, opinion polls may fail to capture the impact of the tweets on public sentiment in a timely manner.
- Uncontrolled Variables - Many other variables (such as news debates) may also significantly impact public sentiment. Hence it is difficult to isolate the impact of politicians' tweet on public opinion from other uncontrolled variables.
- Forecasting Errors - There is a discrepancy between voters' opinions and actual voting behaviour. Hence the scope of this research is limited by the fact that it does not allow us to study the impact of politicians' tweets on actual voting outcomes, but just on public opinion, which can be different from their actual intentions.
- Holdout Approach to Model Fitting Evaluation - We used this approach to analyse our data and prevent overfitting. However, this is not an efficient usage of data as this evaluation approach can have a high variance. Furthermore, the evaluation depends heavily on which data points end up in the training set and which end up in the test set. Thus, the evaluation may be significantly different depending on how the division is made.
- Small Sample Size - Since we had a small sample size (i.e. only 110 polls) the external validity of our analysis is low. Also, dividing the dataset in training and testing data further decreases the size of our dataset which does not allow us to identify statistically significant relationships and draw relevant conclusions.

4.3 Improvements

Firstly, one of the improvements we could make to this study is to collect more data on Public Opinion Polls as well as more Twitter data. The Twitter API had a download limit of 3200 of the most recent tweets per user, and downloading more tweets was expensive, which limited our ability to collect data on more tweets. Collecting a wider range of data would have helped us analyse the relationship between the sentiment of the tweets and the change in public opinion in more depth. Similarly, we were limited by the number of polls we had data on and thus the quality of our findings would have been higher with if we had data on polls conducted with a higher frequency.

Second, since we had a low frequency of polling data, we had to compile tweets according to the frequency of the polls. This means that for some polls we only had a few tweets leading up to the poll date, while for others we had several thousand tweets. This gave us an uneven data distribution and to counter this problem, we took the mean of the sentiment score of tweets to obtain one independent variable for each dependant (change_brexit) variable. As an alternative, we could have looked at the exponential weighted moving average (EMWA) methodology, which essentially gives recent data more importance through higher weightage. The procedure involves calculating a smoothing parameter, which is used to multiply the difference between the recent data point, and the data point which precedes it and then is added to it. Given that recent tweets would be likely to have a more consequential impact on opinion polls, the method therefore conforms with the said logic. This would therefore enhance the accuracy of the model, and consequently, the regression analysis.

Third, instead of just collecting Twitter data on politicians tweets, we could have expanded the range of data collected, by also analysing the tweets from the official pages of the political parties such as Labour, Conservatives, UKIP etc. The main idea is to gather as much data as possible and gain an in-depth understanding of the drivers of swaying public opinion during the opinion polls.

Lastly, the premise of this study could be extrapolated to consider the impact of other influential figures, which could include renowned business leaders, sports celebrities, movie artists and journalists, who typically have millions of followers and a great degree of influence among their followers, and ultimately on the public opinion polls. However, given the scope of this study, we felt it was best to focus on political leaders exclusively.

672098490005221377	Everyone wants to see the end of IS. Today's #SyriaVote is about the practical method of going about it	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672099420494815233	The US air campaign aims to degrade IS. The reality is that IS are now bigger than at the beginning of the campaign	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672099959722926080	We are proposing to join a strategy having the opposite effect to that intended. IS recruitment now doubled from 15,000 to 30,000 personnel	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672100828384219136	(1/2) It is debatable whether British airstrikes would have any effect. At the moment the US fly 7 sorties a day-- against 140 Russian sorties	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672100936941240323	(2/2) The limit is number of targets. The Americans get few from the rebels. We have to create a real army on the ground. #SyriaVote	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672102979156230144	(1/5) The arguments of those saying 'doing something in #Syria is better than nothing' are false. Nobody is arguing for doing nothing	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672103111754936320	(2/5) This is not a choice between action and inaction. It is a choice between inaction and distraction	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672103290654621696	(3/5) Two things can be done. NATO can insist Turkey shuts its border with #Syria. Cutting the $1billion funding from IS oil sales	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672103397651271680	(4/5) Secondly, Saudi Arabia and Gulf states should stop the 10's of millions of dollars of funding that come yearly from them	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1
672103621526466560	(5/5) These actions will not destroy IS, but it will do a great deal more harm than a largely symbolic bombing	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	02/12/2015	1

695201945372463105	It's been over 43 years since Britain joined the EEC. Since then? Europe has become less democratic, less competitive and more dysfunctional	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695202005321695232	The EU has been in decline for some time now. The risks of staying in? Low growth, high unemployment and waning influence	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695202145465974784	Last time EU expanded, less than 10 years ago, hope was Europe would become 'wider, not deeper'. With hindsight, this now looks ridiculous	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695202536559636480	Economic growth in the EU has ground to a halt. Since 2000 the EU has grown at 1/3 the rate of global average. The Eurozone? Even slower.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695202676506779648	By 2008 we had started to trade more with the rest of the World than with Europe. The fact is, Europe is becoming less and less important	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695202772397002752	The Euro has become a destroyer of jobs. Unemployment across the continent is running near 10%, youth unemployment double that at 20%	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1

tweet_ID	tweet	name	screen_name	date	brexit
695202863564333057	The Euro is now a failed experiment, responsible for sovereign debt crises, high unemployment and trade imbalances across the EU	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695202970712084480	Then there is the Schengen Zone, which is now crumbling before our eyes. The migration crisis is a stake in the heart of a borderless Europe	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695203182042075136	The Government has four strands to its once in a generation renegotiation: economic governance, competitiveness, sovereignty and immigration	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695203275948302337	Unfortunately, the Government has wasted the renegotiation opportunity with demands which are so unambitious as to be a waste of time	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695203403845206016	(1/4) Take immigration – where the Government’s answer of an emergency brake will have no impact whatsoever. This is for 3 reasons.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695203639598669824	(2/4) Few EU arrivals claim in-work benefits in first 4 years. In first year – 10%, jumping to around 20% by 4th year https://t.co/fTKWOfmgU	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695203801712689152	(2/3) Second problem is that majority of EU migrants (75%) are only eligible for very low levels of in-work benefits, if at all	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695203898219483136	(3/3) Thirdly, the Government’s own policy of the National Living Wage will have the effect of abolishing in-work benefits	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695204232635498497	The renegotiation’s exemption from ‘ever closer union’ is not worth the paper it is written on. The ‘red card’ proposal? Even less	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695204861370109952	#Brexit is nothing to fear. To remain a member of the EU is to constrain our future, forgo control of our destiny & give up on opportunity	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695204958598250496	Safe course is for Britain to leave. With that in mind it is vital to set out how we leave, and what relationship we can expect afterwards	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695205216896094209	It has long been claimed that membership of the EU increases trade among its members. That may be true for others, but not for Britain	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695205741041467392	Our membership of the single market has done remarkably little to increase trade between us and our European colleagues	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695206213747867649	(1/2) A further supposed benefit of EU membership is increased foreign direct investment in our economy	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695206375811596288	(2/2) However, we have received far less foreign investment than either Norway or Switzerland, both outside of the EU https://t.co/ToxX4kWw3U	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695206938267754497	(1/3) Much has been made on how hard it would be for a single country to negotiate successful trade deals on its own. But look at Switzerland	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695207147517448192	(2/3) Switzerland has a population of 8 million but is able to negotiate better trade deals for itself than the EU does on our behalf	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695207310424199168	(3/3) Does anyone seriously think Britain, the 5th largest economy in the World, wouldn’t be able to negotiate a better deal than the Swiss?	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695207423666229252	(4/4) Our creative, financial & legal industries are some of the world’s best and would certainly be included in trade deals negotiated by us	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695208149507293184	(1/4) To see our importance to the EU simply walk down the street and look at the BMWs, Volkswagens, Audis and the like	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695208246827704322	(2/4) We are Europe’s second largest, and fastest, growing car market	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695208361625796608	(3/4) Within minutes of a vote for #Brexit CEO’s would be knocking down Chancellor Merkel’s door. Demanding	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1

tweet_ID	tweet	name	screen_name	date	brexit
	access to the British market
695208530874359808	(4/4) It's not just German cars, the same would happen in industries across Europe, all demanding uninterrupted access to the UK market	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695208624507981825	Following #Brexit the pressure from EU companies for a free trade deal with the UK would be huge. We have far more to gain than to lose	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695208796692570112	Access to our market is more important to Europe than our access to theirs https://t.co/TNzfDUBAOu	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695209126557786112	The prevailing thought seems to be that the City would be damaged should we leave the EU. That is extremely unlikely.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695209220153675776	Outside the EU, the City would continue to be as free as it is now. But would also be free of stifling European legislation.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695210190195531776	(1/3) A model for UK's relationship with the EU, post #Brexit, is the Canadian Comprehensive Economic and Trade Agreement the EU just struck	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695210367434235904	(2/3)It eliminates all customs duties, which between EU & Canada is worth €470m a year.Similar UK deal would save 5 times that on cars alone	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695210455942483970	(3/3) This would be a perfectly good starting point for our discussions with the Commission	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695211593093795842	We must see #Brexit as a great opportunity to refocus our economy on global, rather than regional, trade	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695211761969029121	#Brexit is an opportunity to renew strong relationships with Commonwealth and Anglosphere countries - currently growing faster than Europe	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695212189976780800	The EU history is not our history. UK has its own proud tradition of fighting tyranny, protecting liberty and democracy both home & abroad.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1
695212335376551936	For us, Europe has always been about trade. For the continent, it is about so much more. But the European Project is not right for us	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	04/02/2016	1

709714469564375040	The #IPBill will have its second reading today. Parliament must use this debate to raise concerns on the Bill as it stands.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709716990592737280	.@StephenHaarper @chhcalling I do, and will later today be raising my concerns on the #IPBill as it stands.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709781674452783105	With the #IPBill we all want to ensure that the intelligence agencies and our police forces have effective powers that will keep us safe.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709781938391937025	There is no doubt an #IPBill is necessary; as @terrorwatchdog said current law is, "incomprehensible to all but a tiny band of initiates".	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709782045703151616	However, there are significant flaws with the #IPBill as it stands.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709782258102702080	(1/2) For example, the ISC called for privacy protections. The Government response? 'General Protections' now 'General Privacy Protections'	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709782451049070593	(2/2) Inserting 'privacy' into a title is not a 'strengthening' of safeguards or a privacy 'backbone' as the ISC recommended.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1

tweet_ID	tweet	name	screen_name	date	brexit
709782597619023872	On bulk capabilities in the #IPBill, we should be under no misapprehension as to how broad, and how potent, these powers are.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709782700375277568	(1/2) The #IPBill as it stands grants our intelligence agencies sweeping powers, with flawed safeguards and little consideration for privacy	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
709782824002396160	(2/2) Parliament must now make amendments that will put in place a law which is the safest, and highest quality framework in the world.	David Davis	DavidDavisMP	15/03/2016	1
